HYDROSTATIC PARADOX.

A Very Pretty Experiment Which Pro-duces Startling Effects.

A very pretty and instructive experi-ment, which I have never seen described, consists in floating a vessel with a hole in the bottom in a fluid specifically lighter than the material of the

An ordinary glass funnel, open at both ends, is made to swim in what appears

The effect is very startling, and, even after the conditions are told, the exact cause may not appear to every one. To perform the experiment, fill a beaker six inches high to within an inch of the top with pure water. By means of the funnel, which should be of the same height as the beaker, pour ordinary sulphuric acid (the e. p. is better, being clearer) into the beaker until the water reaches the rim. The funnel should reach to the bottom while the acid is being poured in, and the heavy fluid will remain in a layer underneath the will remain in a layer underneath the water. The surface of the acid should be stirred a little, so as to cause a partial mixing and render the dividing line more obscure. Then remove the funnel. By placing the glass in a suitable light, it will be next to impossible for a person to see the dense layer at the bottom. Call attention to the fact that there is nother. tention to the fact that there is nothing in the neck of the funnel to prevent the entrance of the water, and lower it into the beaker, where it will float in a most curious manner, and, if pressed down a little, will bob up like a cork. The reason is obvious. As the funnel is lowered into the glass, the water rises in the tube and the level remains constant inside and outside, but as soon as the stem of the funnel dips into the heavy acid a change of level commences, for the downward pressure of the water outside will not constant. outside will not support a column of acid its own height, and consequently the level of the liquid within the funnel falls below the level of the liquid out This difference of level has practically the same effect that a plug in the bottom of the stem would have; the head of the funnel being nearly full of air, it floats just as any hollow glass vessel would. In a beaker filled with sulphuric acid alone the funnel would sink, the glass being heavier than the acid.

The experiment is a very pretty one for the lecture table, and the exact cause of the phenomenon will prove rather a severe test for an elementary tubulated champagne glass, with the bottom cut off, may be used instead of the funnel, and I think likely that a saturated solution of hyposulphite of sodium could be used instead of the acid. It certainly would be safer.

If, while the funnel be floating, one pours sulphuric acid into it slowly, it does not sink, but rises higher out of the water, for the acid expels the water that entered during immersion, from the stem and contact the

This can be shown in a very simple way by cutting a common radish in halves, hollowing the interior slightly, then rubbing it slightly upon a dinner plate. In a moment you can lift up the radish by the tail and the plate with it, for the plate will adhere as tightly as if the two objects were pasted together. This is known as the "Hercules radish" trick.

Cattle Eilled by Electricity.

The experiment of the killing of eat-tle by electricity will soon be tried at the Aberdeen abattoir, where the electric plant is now being installed. If the experiment proves that this manner of killing of cattle has no bad influence on the quality of the beef, the application of electricity will hereafter be general.
